COURSE DESCRIPTION & OVERALL GOAL

In commemoration of World TB Day, this conference will address TB prevention and control efforts in New York City to highlight progress in the fight against TB. Topics will include a review of local and global epidemiology, outbreak strategies, approaches for patient-centered TB care, dealing with challenges and opportunities for strengthening community partnerships. Question and answer sessions and panel discussions are included to enhance interaction and shared experiences.

WHO SHOULD ATTEND

This conference is open to physicians, nurses, epidemiologists, researchers and students, as well as other health care workers who manage patients at risk for or diagnosed with TB infection or disease.

WHY COURSE IS NEEDED

Management of TB requires a multidisciplinary approach which relies on knowledge of local epidemiology, populations at risk and successful interventions. This conference will provide updates in management of TB and prevention and management practices. It will also promote networking among colleagues, resource sharing and collaborations with partnering agencies.

OBJECTIVES

Upon completion of this conference, participants should be better able to:

- Define local and global epidemiological trends in tuberculosis to make informed decisions about outreach interventions and allocation of resources
- Apply the World Health Organization's 2015 End TB Strategy to diagnose and treat patients at risk for TB infection and disease
- Explain strategies for managing tuberculosis outbreaks through collaboration with stakeholders and community partners
